A giant wave killed a tourist in Cabo San Lucas on Tuesday. Another tourist was left in serious condition.

A 65-year-old woman and a 70-year-old man were walking along the beach near the Pacific resort in Cabo when they were hit by a giant wave and dragged out to sea. Navy personnel performed a rescue. The woman was declared dead and the man was left in serious condition, the Associated Press reports.

The woman has a driver's license from Wisconsin and the man had a Nebraska license. It is not clear where they were currently living or if their families have been notified.

The U.S. Embassy in Mexico had no immediate information about the incident.

This isn't the first time someone was killed by a wave. In January, a man named Charles Francis Quaid died when a wave snuck up on him. He was walking along the beach on the Point Reyes National Seashore with his wife and dog on New Year's Day when his wife

Quaid was able to help his wife, but when he was trying to help his dog, he was knocked down by a series of waves and was swept out to sea. His wife survived the incident but Quaid was pronounced dead.

Later in January, a woman was swept out to sea by another large wave in Northern California. She was walking along the beach with her boyfriend and her dog when the incident occurred and later drowned, making it the third incident of its kind this winter in California.

In November, a couple when they were trying to save their dog who got pulled into the ocean by large waves.

These waves in these incidents are called sneaker waves as they suddenly rush ashore without warning.
